By the year 2030, the entire planet will be run on renewable energy—unless the global community fails to keep up. With climate change and extreme weather events—caused or worsened by human activity—becoming a greater threat, scientists are urging the world to rethink its dependence on fossil fuels. Two years ago, the planet’s highest-ranking scientists made a joint declaration at the United Nations. In it, the scientists called on governments to double the pace of efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, from what was being done at the time to a goal of at least zero emissions by the middle of the century. Nearly 200 nations have signed on to the declaration, though many countries have not set in motion concrete plans to achieve that goal.

The failure of some nations to accept and act on the findings of climate science—combined with the risks of rapid climate change and increasingly destructive weather events—have spurred a move to rethink the very basis of our reliance on fossil fuels. At the University of California, Berkeley, researchers have found a number of potential paths for eliminating the burning of fossil fuels, from solar power to electric cars and batteries to hydrogen fuel cells. They found that if the world successfully implements them, it would go a long way toward eliminating the need to burn fossil fuels. Specifically, the researchers found that the world’s energy consumption would need to decrease by around a third. But while the findings were projected to produce the global energy required by everyone on the planet, the researchers also projected that fossil fuels would still be used to
